

If California actually wants to lead on AI, it can't let 3 companies hog the infrastructure

[Article originally appeared in www.calmatters.org]

By Natalie Foster, CalMatters

When California state Sen. Scott Wiener introduced the nation's most ambitious AI safety bill last year, it became a flashpoint in the debate over how to govern artificial intelligence. Senate Bill 1047 caught the attention of tech billionaires, large corporations, Hollywood, researchers and the media for good reason — it aimed to establish some of the first guardrails for AI in America.

While much of the coverage centered around safety components of the bill, and was ultimately vetoed by Gov. Gavin Newsom, it advanced an important proposal that deserves continued attention. Hidden in the bill was “CalCompute,” a policy which would have established parts of the computing power driving AI development as a public resource, disrupting the lock tech giants have on this piece of technology.

Computing power — called “compute” in the industry — is the highway system of the AI revolution, the essential infrastructure required to develop and run advanced AI systems. At its core, this infrastructure consists of massive data centers filled with specialized chips that provide computers with the raw processing power needed to develop and run AI systems.

Today, this infrastructure is dominated by just three companies: Amazon, Google and Microsoft. It's not surprising that the largest tech companies in the world have extended their dominance to the AI revolution with a close hold on compute. After all, you can only build advanced AI models if you have access to the massive computing power needed to train them, creating a barrier-to-entry for small and mid-sized startups and entrepreneurs.

Lawmakers can't let CalCompute die on the vine with the veto of SB 1047.

This isn't a new model. Public options like this are an old idea and a good one because they provide people with the means to participate in new markets and balance out structural power imbalances created by monopolies. America has invested in shared infrastructure like the U.S. Postal Service and broadband and, in turn, we have all benefited from the increased access, innovation and economic growth these public investments unleashed.

The same principle should apply to the computing power that will drive our economic future. Imagine a publicly funded, publicly run supercomputing network that serves not just government agencies and researchers, but also entrepreneurs and innovators currently priced out of the market.

This wouldn't replace private providers — it would be complementary, expand access and ensure AI development serves both market innovation and public needs. Since this public option would be free from profit motives, it wouldn't face pressure to prioritize commercial interests over society's needs or users' interests.

The stakes extend far beyond Silicon Valley. AI will reshape nearly every sector of our economy

Construction Sector Adds 8,000 Jobs In December As Industry Employment And Wage Gains Outpace Growth Rates For The Overall Economy In 2024

[Article originally appeared in <https://news.agc.org>]

Construction sector employment increased by 8,000 positions in December as the industry's headcount and wages in 2024 both rose faster than in the broader economy, according to an analysis of new government data the Associated General Contractors of America released today. Association officials noted that most contractors are optimistic about demand for projects and expect to continue adding employees in 2025 according to a new survey the association released this week.

“While construction job gains have slowed lately, the industry is still adding workers at a stronger clip than the broader economy,” said Ken Simonson, the association's chief economist. “Construction employment should grow faster in 2025, assuming contractors can find enough qualified workers to meet demand.”

Construction employment in December totaled 8,316,000, seasonally adjusted, an increase of 8,000 from November. Headcount climbed by 196,000 jobs or 2.4 percent during 2024 as a whole, well above the 1.4 percent gain in total nonfarm employment. In 2024, employment at nonresidential contractors increased by 3.0 percent or 145,300, while residential construction employment rose by 1.5 percent or 51,000 jobs.

The average hourly wage for production and nonsupervisory employees in construction rose by 4.2 percent in 2024 to $36.44 in December. The year-over-year increase exceeded the 3.8 percent gain in the overall private sector, while the industry's average wage in December topped the private-sector average by 19.0 percent.

The 2025 Construction Hiring and Business Outlook Survey, which the association conducted with Sage and released on January 8, found that 69 percent of the 1100 responding contractors expect to add to their headcount in 2025. Further, on balance they expect opportunities to expand compared to 2024 for 15 out of 17 project types included in the survey.

The most widespread optimism focused on data center construction. Contractors were broadly upbeat as well about the prospects for water and sewer construction, power projects, transportation facilities, manufacturing plants, healthcare, and bridge and highway work. The only categories for which expectations of shrinking demand slightly outweighed rising demand were private office and retail construction.

The survey results indicate, however, that contractors remain deeply concerned about workforce issues and the potential impact of threatened tariffs on materials prices. Association officials said they are urging the incoming Trump administration to make sure any new tariffs do not impact the cost of materials needed for vital infrastructure and economic development projects. They also urged Washington officials to invest in construction education and training programs and expand lawful opportunities for people to enter the country and work in construction.

“Construction activity is the physical proxy for economic growth,” said Jeffrey D. Shoaf, the association's chief executive officer. “If contractors don't have the workers they need, or can't afford the materials required, construction — and as a result economic activity — will take longer and cost more than it does today.”

This new mixed-use development will be located at 1123 Sutter on an approximately 29,700sf site, currently occupied by two structures: an auto repair shop with public garage (at 1101 Sutter) and a mortuary (at 1123 Sutter). At the west side of the site, the mortuary will be removed for new construction of a 22-story high-rise tower. This high-density development will utilize the individually requested state density bonus program to increase the number of code-permitted units from 149 to 286. In total, the pair of buildings will provide 303 new homes, including 38 below-market-rate units. These new units will be offered on a rental basis. If California actually wants to lead on AI in the coming decades, from health care and scientific research to financial services and manufacturing. Three jurisdictions will play outsized roles in determining whether this transformation serves the broader public interest: Washington D.C., Brussels and Sacramento.

As home to both Silicon Valley and the world's fifth-largest economy, California's CalCompute proposal offers a vital model for how public computing infrastructure could work — and a template for federal action.

We've seen promising momentum behind this idea on the national and global stage. New York recently established Empire AI, a $400 million initiative to create public computing infrastructure through a consortium of universities. In the United Kingdom, the government's investment in a new UK AI Research Resource aims to provide access to world-class compute for UK-based researchers. United Arab Emirates has invested heavily in cloud infrastructure.

The Omidyar Network is investing millions into the research and development of open digital ecosystems. And academics like Ganesh Sitaraman, a legal scholar at Vanderbilt University, are providing the expertise on public options for AI to ensure that the future of AI is not monopolized by already entrenched corporate players.

The window for shaping the next digital economy won't stay open forever. Already, the biggest tech companies are spending billions to entrench their advantage in compute. But by creating public alternatives — whether at the federal level or through state initiatives like CalCompute — we can ensure that the next wave of AI innovation benefits all of us, and doesn't fade with a governor's veto in California.
